

72 Research and Practice for Persons with Severe Disabilities 41(1) role in reminding us of our responsibility as humans and in teaching us how to listen. Without Judith, our personal capacity to listen would be diminished, and the injustice experienced by those not being heard would continue. Judith was not the only coach for better listening, but she was at her best as a formidable force to improve our hearing. Judith's School for Personal Assistants and Living Fully Over the years, Judith had approximately 600 personal care assistants who were in fact recipients of one of the world's most remarkable, entirely personal mentoring programs. Judith trained these 600 workers to manage her personal and career needs and to travel with her throughout the world. This experience helped Judith forge ideas about the essence of person-centered support and, in turn, offered her assistants a master class on how to live and participate fully in life. Her assistants came from a variety of cultural, social, and economic backgrounds, and they would go on to become artists, academics, entrepreneurs, social workers and much, much more—carrying with them Judith's lesson to listen to your dreams. Judith supported this by listening to the inner workings of each assistant and tailored her instruction and their work assignments to help each of them to become the most remarkable person he or she could be. No one who worked for Judith escaped her grasp. All 600 of them were transformed. Some of them say that being Judith's personal assistant saved their lives. Dreaming Judith's now famous story about wanting to be a truck driver (even though she had no physical control of her arms or legs) has allowed many of us to learn to listen between the lines for deeper meaning. Her courage to finally reveal her own outrageous dream and then unpack it so we could understand qualifies her as a great teacher. She convinced us of the obvious that our dreams contain the seeds of the directions for our lives. The trick is that we have to listen for them and be willing to hear differently. Because so many of us have come to understand what is under Judith's truck driver metaphor, the dreams of so many other individuals and families have been heard and honored. Bigger lives have been lived and expanded upon, all because of a dream.

Laser Eagles Art Guild Early in life, Judith painted in art therapy. She loved it but was told it was not art! The artist in her was sealed shut for decades, until she rediscovered it when she encountered and then reinvented painting with a "tracker"—a person who holds the brush for you but implements your artistic vision on canvas. For Judith, it was liberating, but because it was Judith, it also became a movement that now allows thousands who have mobility and communication struggles to reveal their own creative abilities and expression. It was a simple idea: artists using lasers to guide trackers to create art. Laser Eagles and its derivatives were born. In her unstoppable fashion, Judith was collaborating with a team of engineers and artists to invent new technologies to allow more people with mobility and community struggles to be artists through the use of iPads and beyond. Still in the refinement stages, these will be incredible legacies of creating a process where folks with few choices are genuinely in control of expressing themselves through art. Yet, another group of people are connected to Judith. Limits? What's That? Perhaps some of the most outrageous and inspirational undertakings were born of someone saying, "You can't" to Judith. She traveled the world, ate and drank with the best, hot tubbed and swam everywhere, canoed many times, and climbed the rock wall on a cruise ship because it was there. When she was told, "You can't do that," she made a point of doing it. She became an actor, starring in two plays and several